‘Quality’ Lag Seen In Education

UA Physicists Urge Reforms

The charge that the education system is in a state of "profound crisis" has made its way to the Arizona University campus recently, and the state's university leadership is now feeling the heat.

The issue is one of "quality," and it's one that has been a concern for educators and policymakers for some time.\n
The problem, according to many, is that the system is not producing the kind of graduates that are needed in today's economy.\n
The state's leaders have responded with a series of reforms, including new budget cuts and increased accountability measures. However, many educators argue that these measures are not enough to address the root causes of the problem.

"We need to do more than just cut budgets," said one educator. "We need to fundamentally rethink how we train our students."
